

Some students, mainly high-school level and below, expect so much from teachers yet do so little work for the class. College students are more likely to be responsible for their studies given that most pay their tuition independently, although these kinds of students can still exist in college. This doesn't make sense to me because it's a choice to extend your education after high school, yet they still take courses just to complain and flood instructor's emails while doing absolutely nothing to prove that they actually care about their education. Moreover, unfortunately, it is very common for high-schoolers to show no effort in their classes in this generation, which is especially sad since most of their parents are working hard and utilizing their resources to keep their children in school. Yet, these kids still put the blame on the teachers and cause distractions to those who genuinely want to learn.